Social cohesion is central for every society to be able to maintain and protect itself. But does social cohesion also mean that all members have to have the same nationality, language, culture and attitudes, or can heterogeneity even strengthen social cohesion? We want to get to the bottom of this through a lecture and especially shed light on the aspects of racism and discrimination and their effects on social cohesion.

With Angelo Camufingo we invited a public speaker on education and anti-racism, who is currently focussing his research on colonial continuities and anti-racist education in schools. He will share his expertise with an emphasis on discrimination and marginalization in the context of integration.
